On the slide for what is Afib, I think a picture of the heart would have been helpful. I didn't like numbers for references. I prefer the references (at least author, journal date) on the actual slide. I didn't really understand the slide on the mechanism of action and why a picture was required, but I am non-clinical so I would defer to clinical people here.

For example, I felt like you made some conclusions prior to discussing the evidence (studies). I would have preferred them to be switched around so that we could have a better chance of forming our own conclusions as well.

Additional comments regarding presentation of clinical data: I felt like you breezed through these areas a little bit quickly. While I agree that you shouldn't spend a lot of time discussing the data, I think you could have provided a little more detail here. Good job on providing strengths and weaknesses, however. I felt like you were able to analyze the studies and determine where they were flawed.

Great knowledge of the topic. I thought you did a great job explaining the background information, both through diagrams and pictures. You were able to take a complex medical issue and make it understandable. You were not afraid to answer "I don't know" to questions that you truly did not have an answer for. Great job.

I thought that your pace was just right and there was minimal reliance on your notes as you were able to come out from behind the podium for most of your presentation. My only suggestion for improvement is to stay away from less professional terminology during presentations, for example "other stuff" (when discussing exercise), or "things".

Additional comments regarding instructional materials:

Good information included in your appendices, and slides were usually easy to read, except for several of the tables in your appendices. Typing them out makes them easier to read. Also need to reference appendices when they come from another source, as well as diagrams (e.g., Mechanism of LCD slide). There were several typos scattered throughout the handout (e.g., your first study's author was Shai, Orlistate, "Author's", etc). Other ways to improve readability is to bold the headings throughout the handout, use bullets consistently (none in the first few pages), and include page numbers.

Additional I thought the content for your presentation was well done for your objectives. As I mentioned in comments class, however, I think it would have been good to include information about these diets being regarding overall temporary or just part of a regimen as they implement life style changes. These diets are very presentation content: restrictive which is one reason people don't stick to them.

Additional comments regarding presentation of clinical data: Overall I thought you did a good job in your presentation of your clinical data, including the baseline data of your groups, but not including exercise as a weakness in second study was important. Also important to include p-values so that your audience can assess the data for themselves. Just be sure to present all data rather than just the conclusions about whether findings are significant or not.
